

The City Inside the Tire

In the circular city of Rumbradia, built inside the ancient rubber carcass of a forgotten cosmic car, the streets hum with the echo of spinning dimensions. The air smells faintly of ozone and burnt citrus. Skyscrapers made of melted clocks rise high along the tire's inner walls, their windows reflecting the infinite blackness of the surrounding void. No one remembers who built the tire, but everyone knows who rules it — King Worath the Lunar Wolf. Every full eclipse, Worath descends from his throne on the Moon of Echoes, his silver fur shimmering with frozen starlight. He howls a decree that ripples through the universe: "Let the flavor of existence be sharpened!" The citizens cheer, for it is then that the Culinary Swords of Greilm awaken. Forged in the edge of a black hole, these swords are not weapons of war but of cuisine. The blade's heat can fry thought itself, searing ideas into edible form. In the grand kitchens of Rumbradia, chefs duel not to kill, but to cook — their battles judged by taste and poetry. The highest honor is to prepare a dish so profound it bends time backward for a heartbeat. Among them, a young mechanic named Elytrix Varn dreams of forging his own Culinary Sword. His workshop lies deep within the tire's tread, where forgotten dreams drip from the walls like honey and the machinery whispers in dead languages. One day, as he hammers fragments of shattered comets, a spark escapes — a spark that sings. It grows wings of light, slicing through the air, and settles in his hand as a blade of translucent hunger. The sword speaks: "Feed me the essence of your doubt." Elytrix obeys. He cooks his uncertainty into a soup of shimmering nebula dust. The dish folds the fabric of reality, summoning King Worath himself. The Wolf King tastes the soup, and for the first time in ten thousand lunar revolutions, he smiles. But beyond the stars, something stirs — a vast Cloud Worm named Sserphelon, woven from storms and forgotten screams. It slithers between galaxies, swallowing constellations for breakfast. Sserphelon hates the moons, for their silver light once froze its heart into vapor. It vows to squeeze every moon into dust, starting with Worath's own lunar palace. The Worm descends upon the Moon of Echoes, its voice like a thousand collapsing storms. Its shadow darkens Rumbradia. Citizens flee to the tire's rim as the sky churns into liquid glass. Elytrix raises his sword — the blade hums with hunger and memory. He leaps through the black hole kitchen, turning space itself into a skillet. With every swing, he cooks the storm, folding Sserphelon's rage into flavors beyond comprehension. At last, the Worm tastes its own fury — and finds it bittersweet. It dissolves into mist, whispering, "Perhaps the moon was only hungry too." And so peace returns to Rumbradia, where the city spins eternally inside its ancient tire, and the Wolf King howls once more — not in command, but in gratitude.